

European Parliament

The European Parliament (EP) is the only directly elected EU institution and, as such, is seen as providing democratic legitimacy for the EU. However, it does not have the powers of a normal national parliament in that it cannot propose new legislation: it can only accept, reject or put forward amendments to laws proposed by the Commission. This has contributed to an image problem for the EP, with many European voters unsure of its role and, consequently, exceptionally low turnouts in EU elections. The Parliament has also been dogged by organisation problems arising from its split locations and the number of different political groups within it.

History

Originally created as an appointed body under the Treaty of Rome in 1957, the European Parliament has gained greater prominence since it became a directly elected body in 1979. During the early 1980s, the EP attempted to gain greater power. Under the Single European Act (1986) it was given the power to veto the entry of a new member state, and under the Maastricht Treaty (1992) it gained the power of co-decision with the Council of the EU. The Lisbon Treaty (2007) extended the use of co-decision, so that the Parliament must also vote on all decisions made using Qualified Majority Voting (QMV) in the Council. Yet, despite this expansion of authority, the EP has still had to compete with the more powerful Commission. This tension between the elected and appointed branches of the EU came to a head in 1999 when the EP used its powers to force the resignation of the entire Commission led by Jacques Santer.

How does the European Parliament work?

The EP meets in Brussels and Strasbourg, as well as having offices in Luxembourg. EP elections are held every five years, and every EU citizen who is registered as a voter is entitled to vote. Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) do not sit in national blocks, but in seven Europe-wide political groups, the largest are the European People's Party (EPP) and the Progressive Alliance of Socialists and Democrats (S&D). The work of the EP is overseen by the EP President, currently Polish politician, Jerzy Buzek, of the EPP group. The present parliament, elected in June 2009, has 736 MEPs of which 72 are British. The number of MEPs was reduced from 785 after the 2009 EP election and the Lisbon Treaty (2007) limits the number of MEPs to a maximum of 750.

MEPs are elected under proportional representation to represent regions (such as south-west England or Scotland). The number of MEPs each country has reflects its population. Whilst the EP represents the electorate's interests in discussions with the other EU institutions, it cannot propose legislation; only discuss, propose amendments, and vote to accept or reject laws proposed by the Commission. EP committees can produce 'own-initiative' reports that recommend legislation to the Commission, but the Commission is under no obligation to act on these. For a new EU law or budget to pass, it must have the support of both the EP and the Council of the European Union. The other significant power the EP has is that of 'democratic supervision' over the Commission – giving it the power to sack the whole Commission through a vote of censure.

Facts and Figures

- MEPs earn €7,957 per month in 2011. Before June 2009, MEPs earned the same as British MPs (£61,820 in 2008) despite having less power and responsibility.
- Across the EU, the average turnout in the 2009 EU elections was 43.4% (just 34.7% in the UK). In 2004 it was 45.6%.
- 1.07m EU citizens have signed an online petition in favour of the EP sitting only in Brussels.
- The EP budget for 2011 is €1.7 billion, 24% of which is dedicated to MEPs' expenses.
- The next EP elections will take place in 2014.

Arguments

For

- The Parliament is important in bringing democracy to an organisation largely run by un-elected officials.
- The Parliament allows many different views to be expressed about the European project.
- The Parliament has important roles in overseeing EU legislation and the operation of EU institutions.

Against

- The EU Parliament is not really a parliament because it doesn't have real powers; it is little more than a talking shop.
- The electorate doesn't take the EU Parliament seriously – meaning turnout is very low.
- The way the Parliament is run – on multiple sites – makes it hugely expensive. The cost of moving the Parliament to Strasbourg once every month is estimated at £135m per year.

Quotes

'[The] European Parliament has a duty to encourage this interest in Europe by providing access to all the views expressed within it.' Josep Borrell Fontelles, European Parliament President, 2005

'There are a number of people who get a seat in Parliament who simply shouldn't be there. They lack qualifications and only add noise and disruption.' Ben Crum, Centre for European Policy Studies

Technical Terms

Co-decision: A structure that means that EU decisions must be taken jointly by the Parliament and the Council of the European Union.

Qualified Majority Voting: 55% of EU Council members (15 states) representing at least 65% of the EU's population must vote in favour of a proposal for it to pass.

Links

- http://www.europarl.europa.eu/news/public/default_en.htm
- <http://www.europarl.org.uk/section/your-meps/your-meps>